DESCRIBE THE PRESENT AND ORIGINAL (if known) PHYSICAL APPEARANCE

erial The Littlefield House is a two story residence with raised basement, attic, and towers. It is built of carefully laid excellent dark red-brown brick with red sandstone trim. Although the plan shows the main hall and entrance to be nearly central, typical of the plan favored in Texas, every device was used to mask this in the facade. The main drawing room on the west and the bedroom above swell out in a large semi-circle. The wrap-around double veranda and almost full cylinder of the library oriole and turret effectively fool the eye. The combination sets the center entrance and tower visually off-center. Irregularity and asymmetry are emphasized still further by an exuberant and varied outline, especially at the roof line. At the front, each element of the interior is marked by a new invention in shape and height of roof adornment. Above the bay of the drawing room and its curving balustrade, a rich Renaissance framed window is set back as a dormer in a convex Mansard roof. The richest stone work is here, marking the most formal room. Applied columns with fanciful Corinthian capitals mark the divisions between the carefully curved windows on both floors. Carved garlands of leaves, berries, and ribbons swing between the capitals, and the acanthus volute brackets are very closely spaced. The front door and main entrance receives emphasis with a split set of three polished blue granite columns at each level. Rising above the main entrance to a full three stories is the tallest tower of the house. Arched and pedimented sham dormers and circular openings punctuate a lofty pyramid. Patterned and colored slate shingles are the roofing material for the towers. Some of the urns and ornaments have been lost but not the spectacular effect.

A two story veranda wraps around the southeast corner of the house. This, too, is a common feature in Texas houses at this time. Here it repeats the curves of the house. The porch floors are paved with red cermaic tile and the railings and columns are of cast and wrought iron, painted green. This delicate iron work may have come from a local company as it is seen in other Austin homes of this period. There is a slight freedom in the design in the Littlefield House indicating that the designer of this iron detail may have brushed with some of the ideas that emerged this same year in Europe as Art Nouveau. The double front and side doors and their fan lights are covered with fine wrought iron embroidery. Here, and in other places in stone, Littlefield's initials appear, showing that everything was custom work. The details of the two sides are continued with care, but the lavish ornament is concentrated at the front of the house. There is a handsome porte cochere on the northeast corner and a carriage house of the same brick and with a central cupola at the rear of the property. The architect was James Wahrenberger of San Antonio and the house was occupied in 1894.

The interior floor plan is basically that of central hall with two main rooms on either side. A cross hall houses a grand three string staircase. All walls of the principal rooms have a high wood wainscot capped with an eight-inch strip of ornate pressed board. A plaster frieze forms the tops of most walls. There are ornate overdoors and mantels. The gold and white drawing room contains a floor-to-ceiling framed mirror and a ceiling mural, both possibly later additions. The second floor plan is basically the same as the first. The servants' bedrooms were behind the four family bedrooms and were a slightly later addition. The house was wired for electricity and also has natural gas and there was one large upstairs bathroom.

A low sandstone wall encloses the property which is appropriately landscaped. The building has been restored with the downstairs rooms to be furnished in period pieces and with the upstairs and carriage house converted into offices.

STATEMENT OF SIGNIFICANCE

The Littlefield House was built in 1893 by a Texas cattle millionaire, Col. George Washington Littlefield. Its picturesque silhouette, architectural embroidery, and somber color contrast strongly with the heavy tile roofs and buff brick and cream limestone buildings of Mediterranean Renaissance derivation or contemporary limestone and brick structures of the University of Texas campus. However, it fits surprisingly well as counterpoint and as relief. It serves symbolically as the only real reminder of the past of a university that is older than it now looks and as an architectural heritage of Texas' Gay Nineties. The house is not only a symbol of an era and the early University, but it also stands for a type of man nearly forgotten. The generous millionaire, sharp and honest in his business and personal dealings, who holds tremendous confidence in his own rightful importance may still exist. But Littlefield was also a sort of man who no longer lives anywhere. He was relatively unlettered and his correspondence is a fascinating puzzle of unpunctuated sentences and strange spelling. He was a proud "Texian" who had risen from Second Sergeant to Major in Terry's Texas Rangers. An ardent Southerner, born in Mississippi in 1842 but in Texas by the time he was eight.

Littlefield was seriously wounded during the Civil War. He made his fortune initially in early cattle drives to better markets in the North. He used the profits on new investments in more cattle but also on other unrelated businesses. He founded the American National Bank of Austin and invested in real estate. At the time he built this home he was owner of the Driskill Hotel in Austin.* He was a patriarch with no children of his own, electing instead to become head-of-the-family to a great number of nieces and nephews, and to their children in turn. Eventually he gave more than two million dollars to the University and was a Regent from 1911 until immediately before his death. Among his gifts were the Wrenn Library and the Littlefield Fund for Southern History, the Alice Littlefield Dormitory, in honor of his wife, and the paving of the "perip", the sidewalk that encircled the forty acre campus, as well as money for a great fountain honoring his own personal heroes. When he died in 1920, he willed his home to the University.

There was a simple, but serious, purpose in building a house like the Littlefield House. Such houses were overstated and sometimes bombastic, composed from hybrid sources, but they meant status in the community and proof of position to their owners. They were meant to impress. They were not the houses of the sophisticated New Englander building in the Shingle Style, although these too could be quite ostentatious. This house is of a character specifically Texan especially in its late use of Second Empire forms.

Recorded Texas Historic Landmark - 1964.
