DESCRIBE THE PRESENT AND ORIGINAL (IF KNOWN) PHYSICAL APPEARANCE

Completed in 1911, the Galvez Hotel is a six-story stuccoed brick building exhibiting characteristics of Spanish Colonial Revival architecture. The structure's red tiled, low pitch roof, plastered walls, and mission parapets are associated with this style. The hotel was erected on Seawall Boulevard and faces south toward the Gulf of Mexico. The St. Louis architectural firm of Mauran and Russell designed the structure and employed a "U" floor plan.

Two five-story wings project to the sea and create a courtyard which has been landscaped with palms and oleanders. These wings display low pitch, red tile roofs with broad eaves and supportive brackets. Both the south and north facades present mission parapeted wall dormers which divide each roof into two sections. Also demonstrating mission parapets, the west elevation entrances are connected by a series of round arched windows and reflect the Spanish Colonial Revival influences on Mauran and Russell's design. A small one-story circular bay section protrudes from the west wing and contains a spacious ballroom. An identical bay extends from the east wing and houses the restaurant and kitchen.

The main section connects the hotel's two projecting wings and contains the majority of the rooms. The central bay rises eight stories and is capped with a hipped roof. Four hexagonal towers with metal ribbed vaults extend from each corner and reveal the broad eaves and elaborate brackets. The top windows are framed with pilasters and are crowned with round arches. Six-story wings flank either side of the central bay and feature gable roofs terminated by the familiar mission parapets. A small four sided tower with a hipped roof protrudes near the southeast corner of the main section.

Originally facing north (away from the Gulf), the main entrance features a porte cochere. The hotel's name and its adopted emblem, Count Galvez' coat of arms, highlight the mission parapet of the porte cochere, and allowed a grand entrance for the many prestigious guests who stayed at the Galvez. The first floor was comprised not only of the ballroom and restaurant, as previously mentioned, but also of offices, service rooms, a large lobby and a loggia overlooking the Gulf. Two elevators provided easy transportation to and from the lobby and the 275 rooms.

The only alterations include the replacement of the original windows with modern fixed glass openings, probably in the early 1970's. Initially, the walls were pink, but have since been painted white. In 1950, a small, one-story motel was attached to the east facade, but the current owner, in his rehabilitation plans for the Galvez, intends to raze this addition to provide more parking space for the hotel.

STATEMENT OF SIGNIFICANCE

The Galvez Hotel stands as the oldest large beach hotel in Galveston. Designed by the St. Louis architectural firm of Mauran and Russell, the impressive six-story structure displays features characteristic of Spanish Colonial Revival architecture and represents one of the few examples of this style in Galveston. Facing the Gulf of Mexico, the Galvez was constructed in 1910-1911 on the 2000 block of Galveston's famous Seawall Boulevard.

During the late nineteenth century, Galveston was among the southwest's most important cities. Besides its prominence as the leading port and commercial center for Texas at that time, Galveston was regarded as one of the nation's most celebrated resort communities. Thousands of tourists visited the city each year to take advantage of Galveston's beaches. The Beach Hotel, a massive four-story frame structure designed by Nicholas Clayton, served as the city's only large beach hotel. In 1898, a fire destroyed the building, and Galveston was left without a major tourist facility.

Plans to replace the structure with another hotel were shortlived because of the infamous 1900 Galveston hurricane. Approximately six thousand lives were lost in the storm, and the city's once flourishing economy was devastated. Because of the severity of damage, recovery was slow; however, the citizens were determined.

During the mid 1900's the entire city's grade was raised several feet, and a protective seawall was constructed to provide protection from future hurricanes. As the local economy was revived, efforts to construct a beach hotel became a priority. In early 1910, a group of prominent Galveston businessmen proposed that a new hotel facility be constructed to capitalize on the city's once popular beaches and help re-establish Galveston as a major tourist center. The project instigators included H. Kempner, Adoue and Lobit - Bankers, Hutchings and Sealy Bank, the Galveston Electric Company, and they conducted an intense advertising campaign to let the country realize that the city was effectively recovering from the storm. A St. Louis architectural firm, Mauran and Russell, was commissioned to design the new hotel. The construction of the Houston-Galveston Interurban Railroad and the high number of reservations created such a demand that the hotel opened on June 11, 1911 before all construction was completed.

The building was named the Galvez, honoring Count Bernado de Galvez for whom the city was named. Offering 275 rooms, the hotel was equipped with the most modern facilities and was regarded as one of the "best arranged and most richly and tastefully furnished seaside hotels in America."¹ Most of the staff was recruited from hotels all over the country, and its reputation was highly regarded. Many of America's most prominent individuals were guests at the hotel. President Franklin Roosevelt selected the Galvez during a vacation to Texas in 1937. Numerous well-known politicians, military men, movie stars and entertainers stayed at the hotel while in Galveston. Since its completion, the building has also been the scene for numerous important social events. The spacious ballroom with its separate entrance on the west facade often served as the location of parties and celebrations.

Despite the attempts of its citizens, Galveston never achieved the prosperity it had achieved prior to the 1900 hurricane. The Galvez continued to be an important enterprise, particularly during the late 1940's and early 1950's when gambling was popular in Galveston. However, when the gambling industry was shut-down in the mid 1950, the local economy became extremely depressed and the Galvez' prestige reflected the town's hardships.

In 1978, the hotel was closed when the current owners purchased the structure. Realizing its significance to Galveston's post 1900 development, the owners plan to rehabilitate the hotel preserving the building's historical integrity and helping the Galvez recapture its popularity as a fashionable seaside resort.
