Description

(good, unaltered)

The small house at 305 S. Ferguson is one of Stamford's earliest existing residences. The wood-frame house is built on a U-shaped plan (with a shed porch connecting the two gables) and has a shed-roofed rear addition. An interior chimney sits along the main ridge line. Multiple entrances and many long windows provided ventilation in pre-air conditioning days. It is in an older residential/commercial neighborhood near the town square.

Significance: local level, architecture

The A.J. Jackson Residence is a good, unaltered, frame dwelling which typifies the inexpensive housing built in Stamford in its first years. The house was erected before 1908, probably in 1905 (according to the present owner, who is the daughter of the original owner).

Most of Stamford's early working-class housing has either been demolished, denatured, or heavily modified with stucco or asbestos-tile siding coupled with the removal of trim. The fact that this little house remains intact down to the original windows, siding, plan, and even trim is highly unusual. It serves as a reminder of the typical early Stamford housing unit, a type of structure quickly disappearing from the local scene.

Reviewer's comments: The A.J. Jackson House is a frame dwelling which typifies the inexpensive housing constructed during Stamford's early years. Although a rear addition to the house is mentioned, the one photograph does not show the addition and thus makes its impact difficult to assess. However, the photograph does attest to the house's eligibility.
