The Cotton Exchange Building is a massive 2-story commercial building with a rectangular plan. Its brick, load-bearing walls rest on a brick foundation. The building occupies a corner, and noteworthy architectural detailing, such as segmental-arched hoodmolds and inset brick panels in the parapet, are seen on the front (south) and west elevations. The building is in the central business district where many similarly detailed and contemporaneous buildings stand.

The Cotton Exchange Building was built in two phases. When first completed in 1891, the structure was only a single story; however a second floor and a rear addition were added by 1900, according to Sanborn maps. In its present configuration, the building is classified as a two-part commercial block with two distinct vertical divisions. Unlike most local examples of this building type, this structure has first-floor openings that are long and narrow where double-hung windows were installed.

The building has two storefronts which face south onto Commerce Street and each has a three-bay first floor. The western half of the building has a single-door entrance in the westernmost bay, and the other openings have double-hung windows. The eastern storefront, on the other hand, has a central double-door entrance and flanking windows. The second floor of each storefront differs slightly; however both have segmental-arched windows with hoodmolds. The western storefront has a 3-bay configuration, while its counterpart to the east has a 2-bay pattern. Both have inset panels with corbeled brickwork in the parapet, but the eastern storefront has a segmental-arched motif in the central bay. The east elevation displays much of the same type of detailing as that seen on the front (south) wall.

The building has been altered over the years. Sanborn maps revealed that the structure has undergone major modifications since its initial construction. The building was first depicted in 1891 as a 1-story structure with a partition wall that divided the building into two stores. By 1900, however, significant additions were in place. A second floor was built and a rear extension was added to the north. The second floor was shown to be completely open unlike the first floor which remained partitioned. Although these changes dramatically altered the structure's original appearance, they are well over 50 years and are considered to be vital to the building's historic character. Other non-historic changes are on the first floor of the western storefront where the original opening has been partially enclosed and a modern door has been installed. These changes detract from the building's character. In addition, some of the bricks used in the parapet appear to be replacements but the brick patterns are repeated.

The Old Cotton Exchange Building is one of the few non-retail commercial buildings in Nacogdoches. With its masonry construction and segmental-arched windows, the building is a good local example of late 19th-century commercial architecture and is nominated to the National Register under Criterion C for its architectural merits. It housed the local cotton exchange which helped local farmers market their cotton. Profits realized from the cultivation of cotton contributed to the local economy which spurred development in the community. Therefore, the Old Cotton Exchange Building is related to Community Planning and Development in Nacogdoches: 1830-1940.

Although cotton had been grown locally since at least the middle of the 19th century, its growers were hampered by poor transportation systems that were expensive and unreliable. The arrival of the railroad, however, afforded new opportunities for these farmers and they soon began to harvest significantly greater amounts of agricultural products. As local cotton production increased, the need for a central clearinghouse for cotton-related business arose and the Cotton Exchange Building consequently was erected by 1891. It was built in the downtown area where most business transactions occurred but faced onto Commerce Street one block north of Main Street. While most of the retail stores and shops were located around the Principal Square and along E. Main Street, Commerce Street attracted many of the non-retail businesses such as warehouses, wagon yards and livery stables. Local architect and builder, Dietrich A. W. Rulfs, reportedly designed this structure, which was only a single story when originally built. By 1900 the second story was added.

Only minor alterations detract from the building's historic character and integrity and it remains one of the premier examples of late 19th-century commercial architecture in Nacogdoches. Although the city at one time boasted many similarly detailed buildings in the downtown, most have been razed or have been so severely altered that their integrity has been compromised.
