Zion Hill Historic District
Nacogdoches, Nacogdoches Co., TX

Description:

The Zion Hill Historic District includes a cohesive grouping of modestly detailed domestic buildings that date from the late 19th and early 20th centuries. The vast majority of its buildings are 1-story frame dwellings with shotgun, two-room, pyramidal roof, and bungalow forms. They are congregated within a small and remarkably intact neighborhood just north of Oak Grove Cemetery and east of the Washington Square neighborhood in old Nacogdoches. The buildings, with few exceptions, display little or no stylistic ornamentation; consequently, no single architectural style defines the district's physical character. The focal point of the district is Zion Hill Baptist Church, a monumental institutional building with Gothic Revival stylistic features erected in 1914. Although the church is a prominent architectural landmark, the district is distinguished by its overall cohesiveness, denseness of development, and its ability to convey a sense of time and place. The district includes 78 buildings with nine classified as Noncontributing, the Park Street Cemetery is listed as a Contributing site.

Despite the connotations of its name, the Zion Hill Historic District is in a low-lying area near Lanana Creek. The land drops sharply to the east from Lanana Street to the small waterway. Few landscaping features are evident in the district, and in fact, some of the streets (or alleys as they are called locally) are unpaved, including Ernest, Gene and Ola Alleys. The streets and alleys generally follow a grid pattern, and lot sizes typically are quite small. Most of the houses, especially those east of Richardson Street, are only a few feet apart. The majority of the buildings in the district face north or south, except for those that front onto Richardson and Lanana Streets and Mast Alley which are oriented to the east and west.

All of the buildings in the district are of wood balloon or box frame construction. Some houses have had their original exteriors covered with asbestos shingles or asphalt siding. Although the application of these materials detracts from the integrity of individual dwellings, such alterations do not overly diminish the area's historic character. Only one post-1940 building is in the district, and few other physical changes have occurred or have been implemented. There are no substantial outbuildings within the district, only small 20th century sheds and garages that have little impact on the district's historic character.

The most common house form is the bungalow. These appear in large number and in several variations. All are extremely simple in design and seemingly uniform in plan. They are largely gable-front buildings of wood balloon frame construction covered with drop, novelty, or clapboard siding. Many incorporate inset wooden half- and full-width porches supported by simple square wooden posts. Some of the examples feature gable vents and almost all have 4/4 wooden double-hung windows. One variation features a clipped gable roof; another the side-gabled roof with projecting additions.

Shotgun houses are the second most common form in the district. Most of these are early 20th century examples of the form. The Zion Hill shotguns are of wood balloon frame construction generally sheathed in drop or board-and-batten siding. Several variations of the basic shotgun form are found including some with side entries and small front porches. All examples appear as either three- or four-room deep plans. Many were built originally with central chimneys to serve as flues for wood burning stoves.

Two-room or "double-pen" houses appear in the district as late 19th century or turn-of-the-century examples of this vernacular house form. They are one-room deep with two flanking rooms. Typically built of wood balloon frame construction, the dwellings often are covered with clapboard siding and rest on brick piers. These two-room houses were often built with single or double gable-end chimneys. Some of the chimneys have been removed. A common variation of the two-room house is the "saddlebag." This house form is differentiated from the two-room in having a central chimney located at the interior partition wall, which separates both rooms. The standard two-room and saddlebag variation are present with either one or two entries on the principal facade. Most of these have wooden full-width porches.

Pyramidal roof houses are also present in the district. They may be of wood balloon or box frame construction and in several variations. Two of the variations appear to be earlier two-room or saddlebag houses which were incorporated into larger pyramidal roof houses. Floor plans vary but are usually two rooms deep making them a double-pen, double-pile dwelling. Some of the pyramidal roof houses in the district were enlarged with small shed additions; many have either wooden full- or partial-width porches.

One modified L-plan house with simple detailing is present in the district. It is of balloon frame construction with drop siding. The house features wood corner boards terminating into a wide frieze board, decorative bargeboards at the gable ends, and a small porch with a hipped roof. Overall the house reflects a Queen Anne style influence.

The Zion Hill Baptist Church, at the intersection of Bois d'Arc and Lanana streets, is the only nonresidential building in the district. It differs in scale and level of craftsmanship and architectural sophistication from the modest residential buildings in the district. The church features a cruciform plan with basement and sits at an angle from the street corner where it stands. The church has a steeply pitched hip roof with gable extensions and corner towers. The corner at the east corner, which fronts onto Lanana Street, is two stories and has a steeply pitched eight-sided roof that is the most dominant physical feature.

The only post-1940 building in the district is a house, and though it was not built within the district's period of significance, it is compatible in scale, size and materials to Contributing properties. The most intrusive elements are the vacant lots where, according to Sanborn maps, small houses once stood. Most were victims of neglect and were razed because they failed to comply with housing codes and standards. Nevertheless, these lots are not numerous, and the area retains its historic character to a remarkable degree.

Though cemeteries ordinarily are not considered eligible for listing in the National Register, the Park Street Cemetery is an integral part of the district and is considered a Contributing element because it adds to the district's overall historic character and is associated with the earliest families settling in Zion Hill.

DEFINITION OF CATEGORIES

Contributing. Properties in this category include structures that add to the district's overall historic character. To be included in this category, a building must be at least 50 years old and must retain most of its historic character. More recent post-1940 changes that can affect historic integrity include the partial infill of porches, the application of aluminum, vinyl or asbestos siding over the original wood siding or the addition of new rooms and wings. These alterations often detract from the original character of the structure, but if the dwelling's basic form remains intact and adds, if only to a small degree, to the district's overall historic ambiance, the property is classified as a Contributing element.

Noncontributing. Properties in this category are those that detract from the district's historic character. The majority are less than 50 years and have little or no architectural or historic significance. An example includes the residence at 405 N. Lanana. Noncontributing buildings also include pre-1940 structures that have been so severely altered that little, if any, of their original or historic fabric is recognizable. Other examples include 400 Richardson and 421 N. Lanana.

The well-known Nacogdoches architect, Dietrich Rulfs, designed the church combining Victorian styling with Gothic Revival detailing. This monumental structure in the African-American community was completed in 1914. It became the third church building occupied by the membership.

Statement of Significance:

The Zion Hill Historic District, northeast of the central business district of Nacogdoches, is an intact collection of modest domestic buildings that date to the late 19th and early 20th centuries and that best represents the nearly self-contained communities of African-Americans that developed in Nacogdoches around the turn of the century. Excepting the Zion Hill Baptist Church and its founding pastor's residence, buildings in the district lack individual architectural significance. When viewed together, however, they comprise what may be Nacogdoches' most cohesive grouping of residential architecture, for they represent a preponderance of vernacular frame dwellings typical of the period. Consequently, the district is nominated to the National Register under Criterion C. In addition, the district is nominated under Criterion A in the area of Ethnic History for its historical associations with local African-American history. The area represents the most intact surviving traditionally black community in Nacogdoches, its developmental history reflecting typical establishment and expansion patterns of African-American urban neighborhoods in East Texas. These settlement and development patterns, while affected by circumstances unique to the social and economic environment experienced by blacks in post-Civil War East Texas, are related to the context Community Planning and Development in Nacogdoches: 1830 - 1940.

The origin and development of the Zion Hill Historic District closely parallels the establishment of many such entirely African-American enclaves near and in cities in East Texas and throughout the South after emancipation. The exclusionary housing attitudes of whites during the late 19th century, which often were institutionalized by law in the early 20th century, created circumstances whereby black communities sprang up on the fringes of urban areas, on land often owned by blacks themselves. This uniquely African-American "suburban" growth phenomenon had little in common with the unfolding of transit-related white suburbs during the period. Black communities grew on the edge of established, predominantly white communities, the black residents settling in areas as proximate as possible to places of employment. This economic dependence on housing location choices, made based on job accessibility, may also have contributed to a strong social hierarchy in black communities: the job one had, as well as educational attainments and fraternal associations, helped define one's standing on the social ladder among African-Americans in early 20th century Nacogdoches.

The approximately ten acres upon which the Zion Hill community was established was originally part of the large land holdings of the Haden Edwards family. Sometime after the Civil War, freedman Frank Walton, born a slave of the empresario's daughter-in-law Sarah Edwards in about 1835, settled on the property and farmed there on the west bank of Lanana Creek. Walton's "homeplace," as he later described it in a deed transaction, was located some one quarter mile east of the Washington Square site of the old Nacogdoches University, which itself was still considered on the edge of town. The Walton property's western edge was the as yet undeveloped Lanana Street, a north/south road shown on the original 1846 town plat of Nacogdoches.

In 1881, Sarah Edwards' children Peyton F. Edwards and Belle Edwards Raguet gave the ten acre tract between "Bayou Lanana" and Lanana Street to Walton for his "lifetime services" to their mother. By 1885, Walton had transferred ownership of one acre in the southwest corner of the property to Millie Rolligan, a relative living with him, his wife Ellen Rolligan Walton and son Peyton; and the adjacent acre in the northwest corner to Annie McNeil, evidently a single African-American woman.

It was at this time that Walton and his wife also offered some two acres of land, just east of the present day Park Street Cemetery in the Historic District, to the congregation of the newly formed Zion Hill Baptist Church for the construction of its first permanent building. The Waltons were original members of this, the first black Baptist congregation in Nacogdoches, which had been chartered in 1879 upon the arrival in the community of Rev. Lawson Reed, a minister from Louisiana. The Zion Hill Baptist group had formed out of the long-established Union Church, a Methodist and Presbyterian assembly of African-Americans led by Rev. Horney Cleaver. Several of the original members and deacons of the Zion Hill congregation appear to have lived near the Walton, Rolligan and McNeil families, indicating that a small community had already grown up on and near Frank Walton's ten acres.

The community that was to become Zion Hill began to grow at the edge of the city near the end of a time of somewhat racially mixed housing patterns, for blacks and whites had uneasily co-existed during the first decades following emancipation. Census records for the City of Nacogdoches in 1870 and 1880 show residences of many blacks and mulattos scattered throughout the city, living near east Pilar, north Church, east Hospital and other nearby streets, among Anglo families of all economic circumstances. This mixed housing pattern was common in other Texas cities and communities throughout the South. In Dallas immediately following the Civil War, for example, black and white families lived and worked among one another in the very heart of the town. Within two blocks of the Dallas County courthouse, African-Americans and Anglos resided and conducted business near one another in the late 1860s, according to findings of a recent archaeological project. Harrison County census data also confirms that in Marshall, a major railroad town in East Texas, blacks in 1880 were living scattered among white families throughout the city. Cities in Georgia also experienced the same phenomenon: in Savannah and Augusta, "many freedmen continued for awhile after 1865 to occupy the housing in which they had lived as slaves...(and) blacks resided in most areas of the city." (Merritt,18)

It is likely, however, that this mixed housing phenomenon was primarily a continuation of an ante-bellum pattern. These apparently "integrated" areas were, perhaps, indicative less of blacks and whites living as neighbors than as living in a continued employer/employee relationship. Census records for Nacogdoches and Marshall, (and indeed for major Southern cities such as Richmond, Nashville and Mobile) show a preponderance of blacks who were living in white areas actually residing on side streets or alleys. African-Americans did not live on Mound Street in Nacogdoches, for example, but on "Mound Back Street," or alleys behind East Hospital or Fredonia Streets.

Significant population growth in Nacogdoches following the arrival in 1883 of the Houston, East & West Texas Railroad (HE&WT) helped bring population growth to the African-American community as well during the 1880s and 1890s. The rapid opening and expansion of the sawmills and other lumber-related commerce created jobs for black laborers, and many families moved to the Nacogdoches area from smaller county communities such as Sand Hill, Black Jack and Chireno. After emancipation, most freed people of color in the rural agricultural regions of East Texas, like their urban counterparts, had remained linked with white families, often their former owners, thanks to an otherwise uncertain economic status and limited transportation and communication opportunities. Once employment prospects improved with the coming of the railroad and industrial development, however, migration to urban areas soon followed. It is likely that this large migration of blacks to the cities seeking work contributed to their increasing isolation in self-contained communities, usually in outlying areas of the cities. Whites feared loss of economic dominance as the number of blacks seeking employment in the cities expanded. Thus began the significant growth and development of exclusionary housing attitudes.

Studies of major Southern cities in the late 19th century period indicate that some of the racially segregated housing pattern was voluntary: blacks evidently sought not only proximity to the industrial or semi-agricultural jobs that were most available to them, but also "a welcome freedom from white surveillance...." (Rabinowitz, 98) It is likely that such a set of circumstances may have encouraged the settlement of the Zion Hill community on Frank Walton's land at the edge of Nacogdoches. There is no known evidence that, as in some major cities in the South, active white efforts to move blacks to "camps" on the outskirts ever occurred.

Census data in 1880 and 1900 indicate that a majority of African-Americans living mostly on the edges of the urban communities of Marshall, Dallas and Nacogdoches were at least first generation and predominantly second (or older) generation Texans. Although the post-Civil War shortage of agricultural workers in Texas resulted in immigration to the state of more than 100,000 freedmen between 1865 and 1900, nearly all remained in rural areas for at least a generation, taking farming-related jobs (Rice, 162). Fewer than 15% of African-Americans listed in the 1910 census for Nacogdoches and Marshall had parents who were born in states other than Texas. The implication that blacks often did not migrate very far from their roots at the end of the 19th century is also borne out by results of oral history interviews which revealed that families who settled in Nacogdoches had come from rural communities in the same or neighboring counties.

During the 1880s and 1890s, while the Zion Hill community was developing at the northeast edge of Nacogdoches and houses such as the Queen Anne-style home of Rev. Lawson Reed at 512 N. Lanana (Site No. 863) and the two-room or double pen vernacular houses at 717 Bois d'Arc and 406 N. Lanana were erected, other African-American neighborhoods around the city grew under similar circumstances.

Rev. Horney C. Cleaver's 25 acre parcel on Orton Hill, southeast of the town center, developed as a black community after the arrival of the railroad. By 1900, the area was generally known as "Negrotown" or "Shawnee," after a major road that passed through the area. Cleaver, born of his white owner/father Charlie Hobbs and a black mother in Nacogdoches County in 1848, had received the 25 acre tract from Hobbs sometime after the Civil War and soon acquired other significant farm properties throughout the county. As had Frank Walton, Cleaver sold, gave or rented portions of his Orton Hill land to other blacks who were settled there by 1904, when Cleaver offered a portion of the property to E.B. Hayward for development of what would become the huge Frost-Johnson lumbermill. Rev. Cleaver's congregation had also grown: the Union Church he had founded in 1869 was renamed the Cumberland Presbyterian Church and a new sanctuary was constructed on Shawnee Street by 1890. A "Colored Cemetery" was also established at Shawnee, serving along with the Park Street Cemetery as a burial ground reserved for area blacks.

Similar phenomena occurred in other East and Northeast Texas areas where substantial ante-bellum African-American populations had existed and where population growth brought significantly larger numbers of blacks to the edges of cities. In Dallas County after 1865, white farmers had developed large parcels (200 acres or more) of mostly cotton crops on land southeast of the City of Dallas, from the Trinity River floodplain to the fairgrounds (proposed Queen City Heights NR Historic District). By the 1880s, however, these larger parcels had been subdivided into five to ten acre plots and cultivated as truck farms or gardens. Evidence indicates that numerous blacks, some of whom may have been tenants or hired hands on the larger cotton farms, rented or owned many of these smaller plots of land. African-Americans established churches in this "suburban" community as early as 1874, and by about 1904 concerted efforts began to re-subdivide much of the land for exclusively black residential use. Across Dallas, on its northern outskirts, the black community of North Dallas grew up in the area of Freedman's Town, a rural, post-Civil War settlement of former slaves who congregated around the black-owned Freedman's Cemetery for mutual protection. There, too, churches and later businesses sprang up to serve the already settled residents of this "suburban" community.

Meanwhile, in Harrison County, the Marshall railroad yards employed many black laborers and semi-skilled workers by the turn of the century, and there, too, communities of African-Americans grew on the edges of the city. Railroad workers, laborers and their families had settled near one another in areas adjacent to the Texas & Pacific Railway tracks on the northern and northwestern fringes of the city, according to the 1900 census. The buildings of the two private colleges founded by African-Americans in Marshall, Wiley College (1873) and Bishop College (1885), were located near one another in this same black community northwest of the courthouse and near the T & P tracks.

Early non-farmer residents of these communities beyond the cities' limits were generally plumbers, porters and laborers, sawmill workers in Nacogdoches or railroad laborers in Marshall, all reflecting the dearth of professional and skilled jobs available to people of color. Only certain professions were regarded as open to educated African-Americans: doctors, clergymen and teachers appeared among blacks in the Nacogdoches and Marshall census records of the late 19th century, but no black lawyers appeared. (As a matter of fact, there were only two black lawyers in Atlanta in 1890, six in Richmond and nine in Nashville. [Rabinowitz, 90])

Despite the limited opportunities for educated youngsters to enter many professions, learning was nevertheless a critical part of life in the African-American communities of Nacogdoches. Results of efforts across Texas after the Civil War to provide education for the children of freedmen had been at best uneven, and white citizens were rarely supportive. However, in many cities, leading African-Americans, often shepherded by the black churches, attempted to create educational institutions themselves. By 1877, the Colored Baptist Board of Education was soliciting funds for completion of the "Centennial" school in Marshall. In Nacogdoches, meanwhile, a tradition of black education in the city was begun by Horney Cleaver. Educated at Prairie View Normal School (now Prairie View A&M, a state university northwest of Houston), Cleaver had helped to establish a school for African-American children sometime after the Civil War, teaching at the school along with white educators furnished by the federal Freedman's Bureau. The opening of a new "Colored School" in the Shawnee community in 1903 institutionalized education for black youngsters, and census records and community recollections tell of a significant number of families in the African-American neighborhoods, particularly Zion Hill, boarding students sent by relatives and friends from the small, rural communities such as Sand Hill, Nat, Black Jack and Harmony where no educational opportunities yet existed. Later, by the 1920s, small country schools for African-Americans began to be opened. Retired Nacogdoches educator Ella Mae Sheffield, for example, began her teaching career in 1922 as an 18 year old in Nat, Texas, west of Nacogdoches. The tradition of student boarders taken in by the urban communities continued for many years afterward, however.

Once the schools, churches, meeting halls and other institutions that served the African-American communities were established following initial settlement of these segregated quarters, still more black residents were attracted to the areas by those very institutions, thereby reinforcing the developing pattern of segregated neighborhoods. Social, religious and fraternal institutions, some scholars maintain, grew during the latter part of the 19th century in African-American communities in Texas in part because blacks were being increasingly and systematically excluded from participation in politics and business (Rice, 268).

The continued growth of the African-American population in Nacogdoches in the 1890s required that the Zion Hill Baptist Church, which had met in the one room frame building on Frank Walton's donated land near the cemetery, needed a larger building. The congregation erected a new sanctuary near the site of their original, outdoor meeting place on present-day Logansport Street somewhat north of the Zion Hill District, still at the edge of the developing city.

By 1910, the communities of Zion Hill and Shawnee were well established, their residents generally engaged in occupations related to their respective neighborhoods. The Zion Hill area was home to primarily service workers: shop porters, and in some cases owners of small businesses, and servants, maids, cooks and groundskeepers for affluent white families who lived nearby. (Open land between Frank Walton's tract and Washington Square, adjacent to the already established black community east of Lanana Street, had been sold by Peyton Edwards in 1899 to a number of prominent white citizens who erected imposing residences on North Mound Street. Many Zion Hill residents worked for the Perkins, Hardeman, Blount, Strong and Stripling families on Mound Street during the early decades of this century.)

Meanwhile, Shawnee inhabitants more often were employed by the lumber mills, cotton gins or the railroad, and long time residents of both communities recall a social and economic rivalry between the two areas. Some remember an early-century desire among sawmill workers' families in Shawnee to "move up" to Zion Hill.

Expansion of the well-to-do white neighborhood surrounding Washington Square and along Mound Street reached farther north during the 1910s. The congregation of Zion Hill Church thus was pressured to abandon their second home on Logansport Street. The church trustees purchased land from prominent Nacogdoches department store owner John Schmidt on Lanana Street, between the predominantly Anglo-American Oak Grove Cemetery and the former Walton farmland. Schmidt assisted the church members by refusing a down payment and financing construction of the new building. He also secured the services of local architect Dietrich A.W. Rulfs to design and build the church. Rulfs, having an exceptional reputation for both residential and commercial architecture in the city, designed a white frame church in an outstanding blend of Victorian-era massing and Gothic Revival detailing. Considered one of the finest church edifices among African-American congregations in East Texas, the Zion Hill Baptist Church was completed in 1914 at a cost of $7,223 and quickly established itself as the social and religious center for members of the Zion Hill community and many other local black families.

The nearby Park Street Cemetery also continued to serve as the resting place for many members of the community. It is not known when the earliest burials occurred there (the oldest remaining legible marker is dated 1897), but numerous late 19th century residents of Zion Hill are interred in Park Street, including Annie McNeil, the Rolligan and Donegan families, and Rev. Lawson Reed himself. No doubt many more former Zion Hill residents also rest in the Park Street burial ground, but fewer than three dozen markers remain within the area enclosed by simple chain link fencing.

Little is known about the history of individual buildings or their owners in the Zion Hill Historic District or other African-American communities in the city. Lot registers and tax abstract records for Nacogdoches during the early years of the century are lost or destroyed, and except for 1935, city directories were not published until after World War II. However, community oral histories reveal that, as the Zion Hill and Shawnee communities grew in the early 20th century, both black and white property owners developed housing for the residents. Family records indicate that Rev. Horney Cleaver owned numerous properties in Shawnee, renting them to both residents and commercial shopkeepers. Meanwhile, the Rolligan descendants, sisters Ellen and Lela, owned a number of rental houses on and near Lanana Street in Zion Hill, and for a time operated a small general store at 504 Lanana Street (Site No. 860).

The vernacular, wood frame two-room, shotgun, pyramidal roof, and bungalow houses constructed in Zion Hill and Shawnee reflect similar housing types and standards to those existing in African-American communities throughout the South.

A description by the British Board of Trade of housing in Atlanta in 1910 could have as easily described conditions in Zion Hill:

The typical dwellings of the coloured people contain two or three rooms...the whole building consists...of one story, built of wood on brick piles. As a rule in the case of two room dwellings there is no entrance lobby, the front room being entered direct from the street....In many instances the houses look as though built upon a piece of wasteland, with all its inequalities unlevelled, and the yards of the houses are often not to be distinguished from the surrounding plots. The practice of building these little "shacks" on brick piles dispenses with the need for a specially prepared foundation. (quoted in Rabinowitz, 118)

(Many current and former Zion Hill residents recall the community as having mostly "swept yards" of packed earth, rather than lawns and landscaping.)

White landlords bought and built numerous residential properties in the community. Current inhabitants report that most of the houses along both sides of Richardson Street were built before 1922 by a white owner whose name is now forgotten. Prominent pharmacist Charles Perkins, whose own house at 516 N. Mound Street was designed by Dietrich Rulfs in 1900, constructed two rental houses on Lanana Street directly behind his new home at about the same time; one still remains, in altered form (505 N. Lanana, Site No.861). Several Mound Street neighbors of Perkins also owned rental houses in Zion Hill: Judge Beeman Strong, Kline Branch and Tolbert Hardemann each built vernacular tenant houses in the district.

Black entrepreneurs established rental housing in the community as well. Between 1922 and 1929, Ernest and Ola Smith who for many years had been employed as domestics by the Blounts, a prominent white family living on nearby Mound Street, built numerous small frame, vernacular rental houses on three paralleling streets that extended eastward toward Lanana Creek from Richardson Street. Casz Donegan's dry cleaning establishment on Bois d'Arc Street adjoined several rental houses he owned on Mast Alley behind it.

A few black-owned businesses flourished in the Zion Hill community for a time. By the 1920s, former lumbermill "sawman" Casz Donegan opened and operated a dry cleaning establishment in the shotgun building at 713 Bois d'Arc Street (Site No.356) behind his own house at 402 Lanana (demolished). Neighborhood residents remember a dance hall in the building at 416 Richardson (demolished), which is also remembered as an early site of a small school operated before the opening of the larger public Colored School in Shawnee. A cafe also existed for a time at 322 Richardson (Site 1245).

Residents recall that the Zion Hill community never had the proliferation of local businesses and services available in the Shawnee community; Zion Hill inhabitants continued to patronize the few black-owned businesses downtown, as well as the establishments in Shawnee. In Nacogdoches, as in much of the South, blacks had dominated some skilled trades or occupations and served a largely white clientele in the early part of the post-Civil War period. The building trades, livery businesses, services (barbering, for example, which for some reason was particularly disdained as an occupation by whites), and grocery and general merchandise concerns were identified by W.E.B. duBois in an 1899 survey as the predominant range of black-owned businesses in the South (Rabinowitz, 78).

Census records indicate that the same jobs were common among Nacogdoches' African-American citizens as well, particularly among Zion Hill residents. However, as in other areas of the South, the early 20th century saw the advent of institutionalized segregation laws, and increasing white displacement of blacks occurred in entrepreneurial trades such as the grocery, general merchandising and even barbering concerns. Whites abandoned black businesses as patrons, further restricting the ability of black businessmen to succeed and confirming the relegation of most African-Americans to the lowest rungs of the socio-economic ladder. Zion Hill-area oral history interviews reveal memories of many early black businesses on Church Street just off the Principal Square, which had co-existed with white-owned establishments for years, being forced out by neighboring business owners at the turn of the century.

Until well after World War II, Zion Hill remained as the preeminent African-American community in Nacogdoches. Several generations of families long-settled in the neighborhood continued to reside there, among them cousins Aaron Reed, Clarence ("Bo") McMichael, and Willie T. Whitaker, Jr., descendants of Rev. Lawson Reed; and sisters Ellen and Lela Rolligan. Children from the community still walked the two miles or so down Lanana Creek to attend the Colored School, renamed E.J. Campbell School in 1929 in honor of a long-time principal. The Zion Hill Baptist Church also continued to flourish. As the black community became more economically diverse, educated and socially organized, interest grew in self-improvement, culture and membership in a variety of benevolent and fraternal associations. Zion Hill residents were active members of Eastern Star, the Masonic orders, Knights of Pythias, American Woodmen and other benevolent societies. As in Dallas, Marshall, and other cities with established black communities, church and fraternal membership were critical measures of one's place in the social hierarchy: "Of what church and order are you?" was a familiar query to many in these African-American communities.

Still legally or economically excluded from or relegated to separate facilities at many forms of amusements accessible to whites, blacks living in Zion Hill and Shawnee enjoyed other types of entertainment during the first decades of the 20th century. Rail and later auto excursions were a popular way to relax, and many long time residents fondly remember trips to the country, or even across town to visit friends and relatives. Picnics, and of course church events, were also favorite leisure pastimes.

While new generations of residents grew up in Zion Hill, little physical change occurred in the community after the century's second decade. Few new houses were constructed in the district following the boom of residential construction in the 1920s. The first street paving occurred in the 1930s when a WPA project laid concrete along the length of Lanana Street; it would be some time before Richardson or Bois d'Arc Streets would be similarly treated, and Gene, Ola, Ernest and Mast Alleys remain dirt roads today. The most significant physical changes to houses in the district since the 1920s have been the application of synthetic materials over original wood siding on many of the properties, and occasional alterations of front porches. The Shawnee community, unfortunately, experienced a more palpable decline: houses deteriorated and many were abandoned; and the huge lumberyard and sawmill facility closed, its buildings demolished to make way for nearby suburban development as the city grew southeastward.

More recently, however, physical deterioration of the Zion Hill community has also accelerated. Many of the simply, and sometimes poorly, constructed vernacular frame houses began to disintegrate, particularly those owned by absentee landlords who now are primarily not members or descendants of the community. Between 1990 and 1992 an alarming number of houses, particularly in the area east of Richardson Street in and near the floodplain of Lanana Creek, have been abandoned and destroyed either by neglect or by demolition. However, fully 89% of the buildings remaining in Zion Hill are listed as Contributing to the character of the historic district, their essential architectural and environmental elements remaining relatively intact.

BOUNDARY JUSTIFICATION:

The Zion Hill Historic District borders the Washington Square Historic District (NR, 1992) on the northwest and southwest. It is separated from the Washington Square district by property lines on the west. The sharp change in topography and resources makes a distinct break between the two districts. The northern boundary is set by Park Street and further emphasized by a subdivision of 1980s houses and townhouses. The eastern boundary is formed by the natural feature, Lanana Creek. The property to the east of the Creek is largely undeveloped and historically not associated with the district. The southern boundary is established by the Oak Grove Cemetery, largely Anglo-American, which extends up to Lanana Street and essentially meets the western boundary. In total, the district is largely separate and distinct from its surrounding property and resources. This separation reflects the cultural development patterns of the community as documented in the narrative.
